

HERAION OF PERACHORA

Heraion is the name given to all ancient temples dedicated to goddess Hera. The Heraion of Perachora was a sanctuary of the goddess Hera, situated in a small cove of the Corinthian gulf at the end of the Perachora peninsula. In addition to the temple of Hera of unusual construction and antiquity, the remains of a number of other structures have also been found, including an L-shaped stoa, a large cistern, dining rooms, and a second potential temple.

The Sanctuary of Hera at Perachora is located 14.2 km NNW of Corinth and 75.9 km W of Athens. . Although there is debate between Argos, Megara and Corinth, the sanctuary was probably under the control of Corinth, as it faced the harbors of that powerful city across the Corinthian gulf. Cult activity at the site continued from perhaps the 9th century BCE to 146 BCE, when the Roman general Mummius sacked Corinth during the war with the Achaean League. In the Roman period, domestic structures were built on the site, indicating that the area was no longer a sanctuary. This site is significant for the study of the origins of Greek temple architecture and rural cults.
